

- We model an ecosystem starting with two species, one feeding on the other. Every new species arriving later feeds on some of the already existing species.
- A new predator would want to choose its prey from such species that are not eaten by many.
- Consequently, a popular prey will face restrictions in getting increasingly popular, which in turn will help it survive.